SWORDFISH SWORD

Fant Firmly Imbedded in Schooner's Side.

When the fishing schooner Nellie Grant was hauled out at Noank, Conn., last week for an overhauling before going into commission, a swordfish's sword was discovered protruding from the bottom near the forefoot. Upon investigation, it was found that it had been thrust through the two-inch planking, and was sticking upward from the wood to a length of 10 inches. It fitted tightly, preventing the inflow of water, which would have been sufficient to sink the little craft.

Capt. John Grant, who is himself a famous swordfisherman, recalled the incident of a fight with the fish. It was about four years ago, and one of these big fish had been struck by the harpooner. The blow crazed the fish, and a fierce fight ensued. The fish was warped alongside, and finally lanced in the gills and killed. When hauled on board, it was discovered that a part of its sword was missing. While plunging under the hull the fish had thumped into the bottom several times.
